AngelEye Health Adds Clinical Advisor

The Nashville office of AngelEye Health has announced the hiring of Jaylee Hilliard as a clinical advisor to the virtual engagement solutions company. She will focus on supporting hospital and health system partnerships with the company. Previously, Hilliard worked at McLane Children's Baylor Scott & White Hospital as the director of neonatal services and the pediatric extracorporeal membrane oxygenation program. She brings more than a decade of clinical experience to her new role. AngelEye recently expanded its video technology to include a virtual care platform, which allows parents of children in neonatal and pediatric intensive care units with visual and audio communication tools, and gives care teams the ability to send patient updates and provide education materials to families. The company, which is based in Little Rock, has offices in Nashville and has its platform available at the University of Tennessee Medical Center in Memphis. "We recognize that the pediatric and neonatal environment requires specialized patient and family support, and we are taking a strategic step forward by adding Jaylee and her clinical experience to our team," AngelEye CEO Christopher Rand said in a release. "Her expertise and passion for family-integrated care empowers our focus on creating solutions that connect, communicate, and educate."
